The Epiglottis.

A modern engine is dependent to a large extent upon automatically working valves for its efficiency, but the perfected valve was invented by nature and applied to the human body long before mankind begun to dream of steam or gas engines. We dignify this valve by the name of epiglottis, and most of us know something about it. It is situated at the back of the mouth just where the air passage and food passage cross. It is the function of the epiglottis to close the windpipe automatically every time we swallow food. If it did not every particle of food would choke us. Now, this valve works with more automat than any ever placed on an engine.
